NATIONAL FOREST POLICY

INTRODUCTION

No. F. 14-7/54-F.—The Government of Pakistan has so far been following the old Forest Policy of the undivided Government of India enunciated in their Department of Revenue and Agriculture Resolution No. 22-F, dated 19th October, 1894, for the management of State forests in the country. Pakistan has only about 4 per cent of its land under State forests against 22 per cent in undivided India. This small area of forests is altogether insufficient to meet the requirements of fuel and timber in the country. A dynamic Forest Policy is, therefore, required for Pakistan to be vigorously pursued to increase the area of forest by large scale afforestation and by introduction of scientific forestry in private forests. Over the greater part of West Pakistan grazing is of paramount importance in the economic life of its population and this subject, therefore, requires a prominent place in the general forest policy of the country. Forests are necessary for development of industries and communications and soil erosion and in conserving water. Forests are also essentially necessary for the preservation of wild life.

2. The Government of Pakistan have, therefore, decided to reorientate the Forest Policy on the lines indicated below:

3. General.—Whereas it is essential to preserve in perpetuity, for the benefit of the people of Pakistan sufficient land under forests to maintain and develop the supply of fuel and fodder to produce an adequate yield of timber and other forest products, to conserve soil, to maintain essential services and industrial enterprise and to improve conditions for preservation of wild life, a high priority should be given in the national development plans to the claims of forestry and adequate forestry programmes.

4. Private forests.—The area of State forests is so small in Pakistan that it is thought necessary to preserve the forests wherever they occur whether on Government or on private land. Forestry is, however, a long term process and the private owners have neither the means nor the knowledge necessary to manage the forests scientifically. It is only on the basis of sustained yield management that forests can be perpetuated—The practice of sound management in privately owned forests should be ensured by legislation or otherwise and such technical and financial assistance provided by Government as may be deemed necessary.

5. Soil Conservation.—Soil erosion has gone on for centuries in the uplands of West Pakistan. Over large areas the country presents a barren look and particularly in the vicinity of Salt Range salination has already rendered large areas at the foot of these hills unfit for cultivation. In all cases where as a result of defective methods of cultivation deterioration of soil has taken place or is likely to take place necessary powers should be obtained to control land use under a co-ordinated programme of soil conservation and land utilization.

6. Public support.—The devastation of forests both by faulty agricultural methods and unregulated grazing has gone on to such a large extent that the conservation of forests is only possible by mobilization of public opinion in its support. Public support should be enlisted for the execution of forest policy through education, propaganda and demonstration.

7. Classification.—Even the small area of State forests in Pakistan does not yield timber and fuel through out. Large tracts are more forest lands than forests. Some forests are more necessary for preservation of soil and water than for production of timber and fuel. Forests should be classified on the basis of their utility and objects.

8. Commercial aspect.—Great importance has been attached in the past to the commercial aspect of forestry as forests cater principally to the requirements of the individuals. The beneficial aspect of forestry should now get precedence over the commercial aspect. It is only then that love of forestry can be created in the minds of the people without which maintenance of forests becomes extremely difficult. The commercial aspect of forestry should be as far as possible subordinated the over-riding requirement of an integrated economic policy devised for the country as a whole.

9. Forestry on reclaimed land.—The extent of forests in West Pakistan is extremely poor and will not extend to more than 3 per cent of the land area. The growing of trees in this part of Pakistan is limited by the availability of water. While agriculture is being developed by harnessing the water resources, forests have been raised with canal irrigation. Afforestation is possible on the canal banks, road and railway if water can be made available to the plants. Make the people tree minded small plantations have to be insisted on in all new colonies. It is by such concerted efforts that the total area of particularly in West Pakistan can be increased. Realising the deficiency of forest area in the country bold and a properly planned programme should be undertaken for increasing forest area by methods suited to local conditions. For example in Pakistan the objective can be achieved by (a) using at least 10 per cent of canal irrigated land for per cent water supply for raising irrigated forests in the new tracts, (b) growing trees along canals, road and railway tracts and on arable waste land, (c) encouraging farm forestry, on co-operative by village communities in compact blocks of land set apart for the purpose.

10. Utilization.—By far the larger area of forests in Pakistan lies in the province of East Bengal, one of the most thickly populated parts of the country. The forests there are situated in inaccessible areas where cultivation is difficult. Big trees occur in the forests and they cannot be extracted and brought to the market for lack of equipment and transport facilities. In order to make full use of the forests timber in the country intensive utilization of forests in those forests is necessary—Existing forests should be developed by encouraging the most efficient utilization of timber and other forest products.

11. Working plans.—The sure method of preserving forests is to work them on a sustained yield basis under a regular Working Plan. Such Working Plans ensure that the forest area carries a normal yield which will yield a definite amount of produce for consumption every year. Whenever a forest area is felled it will be regenerated with species of trees of equal value if not of greater value. All forests should be managed under an approved Working Plan.

12. Forest Service.—Forestry is a complicated process and a long term project. Highly trained experts are, therefore, necessary to manage forests scientifically over a long period of years. Every often the rotation extends to 100—150 years. Even for production of firewood the rotation is 20—30 years. A properly constituted forest service of fully trained persons should be made responsible for the execution of forest policy.

13. Research and Education.—In dealing with a forest whose life often extends beyond a century extensive research is necessary not only to find the most effective method of utilization but also for protection and improved yield of the crop over long periods. Research and education which are the pre-requisites of an effective forest policy should be organized on suitable lines.

14. Fauna.—Forests are the only areas where the land fauna of the country can be maintained. Pakistan is rich in wild life. Whether it is the elephants and tigers of East Bengal or wild goats and chinkaras of West Pakistan the over of a forest is essential for their existence. It is in fact the ruthless destruction of forests in the past that number of wild animals is steadily going down. Adequate protection and living space must be provided to the animals to prevent their total extinction and the measures taken for the preservation of wild life serves human beings in more ways than one.

15. ORDERED that copies of the Resolution be forwarded to the Provincial Governments and all the Ministries of the Government of Pakistan.

16. ORDERED also that the Resolution be published in the Gazette of Pakistan, for general information.
